A Pioneer's Story of a Famous California
Hunt's Case.

The following story is told by an old pioneer of California as the cause that led to Joaquin Muriella becoming a hunter and an outcast. The famous hunter was well known in San Jose and this county was the scene of many a daring and bloody exploit.

When thousands of gold seekers were pouring into California from all directions and from all countries, there lived near Sonora, Tuolumne county, a young Mexican named Joaquin Muriella and his wife Cornelia. They occupied a roughly but comfortable made cabin of three rooms and all who made their acquaintance were struck most pleasantly with their happy contentment and the many evidences of their devotion to each other. Both were possessed of kindly, happy dispositions; they were intelligent, and the husband spoke English with considerable fluency. Muriella was engaged in gardening, and along both sides of a little stream that flowed near the door of his cottage the ground had been carefully cultivated and was covered with numerous vegetables which would soon be ready for market. Vegetables in these days were worth almost their weight in silver, and the happy gardener worked and planned for the future when he could return with his wife to their native land he could hear the happy housewife singing some sweet Spanish love song which he knew was familiar to him.

A Mr. Wilson, an American, who had a claim near by, made his home at their cottage, and all three were warm friends.
Muriella was deriving an ample income from his garden, and with the money received from Wilson for board their prospects were very bright. About this time the gold fever increased in intensity. Men became more selfish and less polished. There was a whirl of excitement; fortunes were lost and won at cards; murders were of frequent occurrence, and in all directions men were roaming the hills and gulches, and their eyes seemed to glare insanely as they peered into every purring brook and under every boulder for gold. The happy life at the cottage were not disturbed for some time, but on a beautiful Sunday morning in April, Wilson and Joaquin Muriella and his wife were seated outside of the door conversing on their prospects and planning for the future.
As they were thus pleasantly building castles like happy children five rough men appeared a short distance below the cabin, all loaded with mining equipments. They halted and commenced prospecting in the stream. The result seemed to be highly satisfactory, for there was a general yell, and active mining operations were at once commenced.
The men, who were from Missouri, and had just arrived in the mines, worked almost constantly. They followed the gold streak up the stream, and at length approached this beautiful garden, valuable as a gold mine, with its wealth of vegetables of all varieties. Muriella and his friend Wilson began to be apprehensive of trouble and at length both visited the miners and requested them as a favor not to mine through the garden, but to go on the other side until the valuable crop could be taken off the ground.

They refused to heed this request and answered roughly that they knew the law. Muriella suggested that Wilson go to town and get legal relief. Wilson started and returned in two hours. It was 4 o'clock in the aftnoon when returning he came in sight of the little cottage. He stopped and gazed, but could see no one around the house. He quickened his pace, while visions of some terrible trouble filled his heart. He reached the stream—the miners, with all their belongings had departed, and the thought that they had left him alone in the garden filled his mind. He dashed into the garden, and in a few minutes he was alone. He looked at the little cottage. The light of reason seemed to have left his eyes, which stared and rolled like a demon's.
There was a hissing sound, and from his throat came incoherent cries, a scream, while his body writhed like a serpent.
Then in a quick over the man, Wilson at the top of a hill. As they fell Muriella saw to his feet with a cry of agony, such as Dante alone could describe. He rushed into the bedroom, and there lay his wife apparently dead; her clothing was torn from her person, and her pallid face told of the awful experience through which she had passed. Muriella threw himself beside her on the bed, and a crying her to his breast, cried out: "All quiere, mi querida!" (my darling, my darling). Wilson stood faint with horror at the scene, and could not suppress a chill at his heart as the frantic husband now paced up and down the room, almost shrieking: "I will kill them! I will kill them!" Again and again would he rush into the bedroom with endearing expressions, and then pace like a savage animal up and down the floor of the other room. Wilson realized that it would be no use to endeavor to pacify the man. He had suffered an hour of horror that had burned deeply into his soul. He had witnessed that which had changed his whole nature and blasted his whole life. Wilson at length went to the bedside where lay the almost lifeless figure. He detected signs of life, and took such means as were at hand to revive her. He was successful. Her husband took her in his arms as if she were a little baby, and carried her to and fro, covering her face with kisses.
Before nightfall Muriella had become more calm outwardly, but Wilson could see by his eyes that a tiger, thirsting for blood, lurked in the man's soul. Cornelia was taken to Sonora, and there placed with a friend, and a physician summoned. She was ill a long time, but recovered.

Muriella disappeared. A week afterward Wilson learned that two men had been killed near Columbia. Within three weeks three more were murdered. The Mexican's revenge was complete. He had avenged the outrage that had blasted his life, and was an outlaw.

—Mrs. Eliza Garfield, the late President's mother, who has recently died at Mentor, O., aged eighty-six, was born in New Hampshire, and moved to Ohio with her husband in 1850. A boy child was born and a year later died, but her husband soon died, and Mrs. Garfield was left to struggle with many difficulties. She faced them heroically, refused to let her elder children out to work among the neighboring settlers, toiled with her own hands to keep them together under her own eye, and from her they received the first rudiments of an education.
